Nursing Tips for Fussy Babies

Babies fuss for many reasons: too hot, too cold, wet or dirty diaper, etc. One or two fussy bouts each day is a normal part of baby behavior. Babies cry to tell you that they need something to be different.

Calming babies is a learned skill. It doesn’t happen by instinct. Nursing and lots of skin-to-skin contact are great ways to calm babies! You can also try the age old methods: swaddling, shushing, gentle jiggling, sucking and positioning baby on his side or stomach. Ask WIC for information or search the web for Happiest Baby on the Block or WIC’s Understanding Baby Behavior. Some moms worry about their milk supply if baby goes through fussy bouts. Remember...

- Young babies need to eat often. It does NOT mean you are losing your milk. Frequent feeds are normal and comforting for your baby.
- Respond to your baby’s early feeding cues (fingers to mouth, lip smacking, rooting for breast, etc.) Crying is a late sign of hunger. If you wait until baby starts crying, latch will be difficult.
- Respond to signs that baby is full. When baby falls off the breast after a good feed, he drank enough milk. In an hour or so, he’ll let you know he wants another “refill.”
- Giving formula after nursing will cause overfeeding. Overfeeding = stomach aches and lots of spit up. And formula is hard to digest. The result? More fussiness!
- It’s OK if the baby does not eat at regular times. When he wants to eat, nurse him.
- Burp your baby after nursing on the first side. Offer the other side. He may or may not take it.
- Once your baby is nursing well and is over a month old, a pacifier can help. Some babies have a very strong need to suck and a pacifier can be comforting.
- Some babies get fussy because of something the mother eats. Milk and dairy products are the most common. If a certain food bothers your baby, avoid it. It may take a week before you see any change. You may be able to try the food again later on.
- Decrease or stop smoking and caffeine as these can cause fussiness.

Mother’s Milk: The original comfort food for fussy babies